

Google Ad Spend — The Fix

The situation in one line

You're already spending $2,500/month on Google Ads — about $30,000 a year. This isn't a new cost to add. It's a cost that's currently being wasted, because the paid clicks land on a site the audit already flagged: the price list is a JPG Google can't read, "Book Now" redirects off-site, the nav links dead-end to the homepage, and no reviews show. You're paying premium prices to send ready-to-book clients onto a page that leaks them.

Where the money is going today vs. after the fix

	Today (broken site)	After (tuned site)
Monthly ad spend	$2,500	$2,500
Avg cost per click (~$5.50)	~455 clicks	~455 clicks
Booking conversion*	2–4%	8–12%
Net-new bookings / mo	9–18	36–55
New revenue (@$120 ticket)	$1,080–2,160	$4,360–6,600

Conversion ranges are working estimates based on the audit's own benchmarks, not measured data. Final figures get confirmed once analytics are on the new site.*

The same $2,500 plausibly produces $3,000–4,000 more per month once the site stops leaking — before counting the automations, no-show recovery, or lapsed-client win-backs. The retainer pays for itself out of recovered ad waste alone.

Who pays for what (so it's clean)

- Ad spend stays a pass-through. The $2,500 is paid by you, directly to Google, on an Ads account you own — matching the "you own everything" promise. It never touches the retainer.
- My fee sits beside it, not inside it. Build + automation retainer is separate; ad management is either a flat add-on or ~15–20% of spend. Your $500 / $1,200 / $2,000 retainer tiers stay exactly as they are.
- The pitch line: "Keep spending the $2,500. I make it convert and I manage it — my fee comes out of the upside, not your ad budget."

One honest caveat

$2,500/mo likely overshoots the tight Cape Coral color-search inventory. Summing the high-intent local terms, the core market is only ~500–780 searches/month. Spending all $2,500 on search forces bids into broader, lower-intent terms where conversion drops. Part of the win is reallocating — shifting some budget to Meta/Instagram retargeting (where before-and-afters sell) and to Google Business Profile + organic, which cost nothing per click. That positions you as someone optimizing their money, not rubber-stamping a number.
